Drawing the Figure  61

rests on the outer arm contour line while the under arm contour line is hidden inside the sleeve. Some wrinkles will appear on the top of the sleeve, revealing the shape of the arm. If the arm bends, the surface of the sleeve will reveal the elbow knob because the elbow will touch the sleeve. The elbow is where the material will fall away from the body, so it is the fall-away starting point. The inner angle of the elbow will show several folds on the sleeve at the bending area; the angle of the outer bending area may show pulling wrinkles radiating from the elbow. The same principle applies to bending legs and swinging hips. If the garment is a short-sleeved shirt, the shoulder will be the fall-away point. The hip will be the fall-away point for short skirts and shorts.

Use different types of lines to express and accent the textures of garments. The wrinkles and folds can be sharp, crisp strokes; soft, fine, flowing strokes; or thick and bold strokes. Crisp strokes express angular folds to give the garment a full silhouette. Soft, fine, flowing strokes reveal more body curves because the material usually clings to the body (see Figure 1-79). The strokes also show the texture of the material. Thick, bold strokes show bulkiness and bluntness, and they give a full and massive silhouette. Longer strokes present cleanliness and sharpness to show a tailored silhouette. Short/broken or multiple strokes create a textured, aged, ragged impression, and show a loose and shapeless silhouette (see Figure 1-80).

Figures 1-81 through 1-87 are design samples of garments with the body in action.
